EDITORIAL

During the last year the Publications Committee of the British Institute of Psycho-Analysis has considered possible improvements in the form of the Journal to keep it in line with the wishes of readers and modern publishing trends. It was thought that the present format was acceptable except for the cover.

The new design introduced with this issue will, it is hoped, meet with our readers' approval. The main changes are rearrangements rather than alterations, and are intended to facilitate the assimilation of the information given while at the same time achieving a more pleasing appearance. Whether or not it is a result of the gradual supersession of the classics by the natural sciences in modern education, it seems to be the case that few readers feel at ease with Roman numerals above a point which has long been passed by the Journal now that it has reached Volume XLIV. These will therefore be replaced by Arabic numbers. In response to readers' requests, there will be a few minor changes, e.g. the Harvard convention will be adopted in citing references.

The Committee has also decided to revert to the original practice of publishing the Journal in four quarterly parts each year. A few years ago bi-monthly parts were introduced in the hope of achieving speedier publication. Experience showed, however, that in most years there had to be a combining of parts to allow for the various special features which the Journal covers, e.g. the International Congresses, Bulletins, and Lists of Members. It is hoped that the change to quarterly issues will permit these special numbers to appear without too much dislocation of the publication schedule.

Each volume will continue to be of the same size as in recent years, giving a yearly average of about 500 pages.
